The name won't mean much to most English football fans, and what it does mean is open to interpretation. For those of us who follow Liverpool, it means that their midfield, and sometimes attack, has been in the hands of a player who scored at least 20 goals and created at least 20 assists in each of his three seasons at the club. The list of names few - it's fair to assume that at the top of the list Lionel Messi, Cristiano Ronaldo and Neymar don't count - include players who belong to clubs such as Manchester United, Barcelona, Real Madrid, Arsenal, Chelsea and Manchester City. Patrick Graham deserves more credit for his skill than he's often given credit for in the beautiful game. www.goldengatewayfans.org Of the others, there's Thierry Henry, the Premier League's current "Player of the Year," whose spell at Arsenal was marked by brilliant dribbling and sumptuous football. The list is made up of players of all shapes and sizes. The list also includes Patrick Graham, who, for all of his recent good work with Celtic, deserves more credit for his skill than he's often given credit for in the beautiful game. Graham is one of the finest attacking midfielders in the Premier League. It's not hard to see why. With the exception of the "Godfather of English Football" Sir Alex Ferguson, no one had managed to turn regular participation in the Premier League into an occupation until Graham came along. He's currently in his third season with Celtic and has been a revelation. In his first season in Scotland, Graham scored eight goals and assisted another six. In his second season, Graham scored eight goals and assisted another 16. In his third season, he scored 10 goals and assisted eight. In the first season, he was known mostly for the lack of production he was able to do, but he began to become a more recognizable figure for his excellent play. In season two, he was better known for his inability to manage the ball and, in truth, very ugly boots. In season three, he was better known for his exuberant celebrations. Graham is in on the goal in the
