The pack includes 15 sets of dock-ready icons designed to bring a new look to your dock without creating a clutter of extra icons. The Australian people see the Coalition as being a bunch of bigots and racists. When Australians approach the polls to vote, they're going to think of Labor, under Bill Shorten, as being a bunch of bigots and racists. This is not just when the polls show Labor well ahead of the Coalition, at least temporarily, but also when Labor is leading on the day. For a clear example of this, take this radio interview with the ABC's Kate Torney on Sydney's 2GB. Broadcaster Cameron Williams asked about her lack of confidence in the Coalition. "Why?" he asked. "Because the leader of the Coalition, Malcolm Turnbull, ... has been turning it into a debate about who's a bigger racist," she said. "They're racists." Williams repeated. "The whole country, as it has turned out, does not feel that the Coalition is a bunch of bigots and racists." Torney continued: "We're just asking the voters to say: 'What's the alternative? That's what we're saying: who's the alternative? Who is a better person to lead the country?' And, of course, that's going to be the choice that people make on 24th of September." As you can see, it's about who's a bigger racist. That's not a question of policies;

it's about the personal character of the people who lead the parties. Both these parties have long existed solely to serve the interests of the two largest blocs of voters in our country: the business and professional classes and large corporations, and the conservative and government-worker classes. Corporate Australia and government workers provided the votes for Labor, when they could get enough of them, and now they provide the votes for the Coalition. Turnbull, who has the message of the Coalition advertising across the media, has been trying to downplay it. But the messaging has become almost overwhelming. The Coalition's advertising screams "bigot" repeatedly, and it's not going to change any time
