[Therapeutic problems of herpesvirus infection. Differential diagnosis in immunocompromised patients]. Herpesvirus infections are a frequent cause of illness in immunocompromised patients. They are particularly common in persons suffering from acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS), and are also seen in transplant patients, pregnant women, patients undergoing bone marrow transplantation and patients treated with immunosuppressive agents, such as cytotoxic drugs, azathioprine, or OKT3. The clinical presentation of these infections ranges from asymptomatic viral carriage to primary and reactivated lesions of the skin, urogenital tract, or the nervous system. The diagnosis of herpesvirus infections is based on virus isolation, virus serology, detection of specific antibodies and antigenemia. Differential diagnosis of these infections with respect to the different clinical patterns may be difficult. In this review, we focus on the clinical presentation of primary and reactivated herpesvirus infections in immunocompromised patients. In addition, we discuss the therapeutic options in these
