Q: Is it safe to kill an NSThread inside its own NSThread's completion block? Is it safe to kill an NSThread inside its own NSThread's completion block, or is there a more appropriate way to dismiss its own NSThread? I have a custom NSThread subclass that does a lot of work on behalf of the main application. While this work is being done, I want to make a call to the main thread, where the main thread can either dismiss the custom thread completely or ask it to stop. If I were just to call terminateAllThreads on the main thread, I would risk terminating all the NSThread's that the main thread created. Therefore, I thought it would be safer to take advantage of the completion block and either call terminateAllThreads() myself, or ask it to send the message itself. Is this the correct way to do things, or am I stepping on a dangerous ground somewhere? Update: Apparently, calling terminateAllThreads() from within the thread's completion block will cause a crash, so I will have to do it from the main thread. This is not ideal, but it would be acceptable. A: Yes. NSThreads have no problem for when they create themselves and self terminate them. For example, NSRunLoop is a subclass of NSThread, and NSRunLoop is a subclass of NSOperation.
