Sid Meier's Civilization: Rise of the Republic, the spiritual heir to Civilization IV, isn't pretty. It's not the pretty, animated campaign video of the world's greatest civilization on a grand, global scale with gorgeous long shots of soaring spires, and gigantic armies and air forces in the sky. The graphics are the exact opposite of Civilization IV: Rise of Nations'.

It's pretty ugly. Its face is bowed, perhaps, and there are some spindly limbs too. But the color tone, the aforementioned storms and the mud, owe a lot to the same universe behind Rise of the Planet of the Apes. The style is much more suited to the game in some ways, but fit this kind of game and has more appropriate roughness. It's more defiant of what the game is and has to be.

There's also more detailed character models, but the focus is on seeing the world through the eyes of your civilization, which is mirrored by the tiny 19th-century portraits you use as your unit overview during the game. It slows things down a bit. This is also a game I suggest playing with a friend or a buddy online

To determine the effects of goat milk and handling on shrinkage, the storage of small containers of goat milk was studied at 15°C and 37°C for 4 wk. Shelf and center temperatures were also measured. The levels of a- and β-carotene and the acidity were measured, and carotenoid levels were regressed on color intensity. The pH fell over the 4-wk period, as did the acidity. The milk samples exposed to higher temperatures had less shrinkage than samples exposed to cooler temperatures. The storage of small containers of goat milk at 15°C or 37°C generated more shrinkage than storage at 10°C. Higher β-carotene and yellow carotenoid levels and lower levels of a-carotenoids were associated with greater shrinkage. Heating for 10 min at 98°C had a lower impact on shrinkage than prolonged heating. This study provides insight into the effects of heat and conditioning on shrinkage and carotenoid content and color of goat milk and products made from goat milk.Q: Splitting up a javascript variable into an array I'm trying to get the below array: var str = ''; I want to split it up into an array, so that I can access the string values like $string[1] or $string[2] etc. There is probably some really easy and obvious solution, but I just can't work it out!
