polycephalum optimizes utilization of light and water. The cellular slime mould Physarum polycephalum is a multicellular organism that can perform chemotaxis as well as guided and random motion. Because Physarum displays reliable chemotaxis to amino acids but is not known to show chemotaxis to urea and CO₂, it has been used to study the chemotactic behavior of these compounds in a microtitre plate. In our previous experiments we used a standard design of the plates with constant nutrient sources, each covered by a non-transparent membrane and the respective chemotactic stimulus applied in the middle. In contrast to other investigations in Physarum, we now have tested a new design with increasing concentrations of urea and CO₂ in the middle compartment. In this experiment the converse to the standard design was realized, each of the three chambers with a gradient from 0 to 9 mM urea or CO₂ around the centre, containing either 6 mM urea (towards the substrate) or 3 mM CO₂ (away from the substrate). In contrast to standard conditions with constant concentrations of the two compounds in the corners, the new design allowed us to compare the linear relationships of increasing gradient to response, up 0cc13bf012
