In an article on Australian news source ninemsn, it was revealed that the Australian government would be creating a new committee to come up with regulations on ICOs, however it was left unclear on whether or not they would regulate initial coin offerings as a full cryptocurrency or as an Initial Exchange Offering (IEO). IEOs occur when a cryptocurrency project sells tokens directly to a specific exchange in order to quickly launch its project. Then when the project is launched on its exchange, tokens are sold on the project's native exchanges like Binance or Kucoin. Australian politician Senator John Williams has been quoted as saying: I expect the regulator will come under pressure to regulate not only initial coin offerings, but possibly secondary market trading that's already been developed. The report goes on to explain that this new committee would be able to make decisions on the promotion, sale and trading of digital currencies as well as "the risks associated with the purchase and sales of digital currencies". The report also mentions that Senator Williams will chair the committee and that the committee would also consist of representatives from the Australian Competition and Consumer Commission, as well as representatives from “the Bank of Canada, Financial Stability Board, Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering and Terrorist Financing, U.S. Treasury, Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and Financial Services Board of Canada”. The Director of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission
