Italy in World War II is a different kind of campaign, based on the North African campaign during 1942-43. The historical setting is centered on the four Italian provinces of northern Africa, with all major campaigns happening in Egypt, Libya, Cyrenaica and Tripolitania. During the 1940-41 campaign, the Italian Army was pushed out of Africa after being outflanked by the British in the Western Desert Campaign. The Italians were then boxed in and outnumbered, and had to defend a line of fortifications along the Italian border in the Tunisian province. The campaign saw heavy fighting along the border and in the mainly mountainous terrain. For the second campaign, Italy decides to send a full-scale offensive into Africa. The Royal Italian Army would attack Egypt, despite knowing that the British had to reinforce their forces for the invasion of India. How Did War Go in Sudden Strike 4 – Africa – Desert War? When the war began, Soviet Union knew about Italy's attack on British interests in Africa, and made a counteroffense starting the Soviet-Italian war. The Soviet counteroffensive started with a massive artillery bombardment of Italian positions. After a few days of tough fighting, the Soviet offensive moved westward and the Italians had to retreat. Having cleared the way, the Soviets continued the offensive to reach the city of Sidi Barrani, which was an Italian headquarters and supply base in Africa. The Italians had to halt the Red Army's advance to Tobruk and the Kasserine Pass, but if they won, it would mean victory on the African front. A counterattack to drive the Soviets out of Africa was now a real possibility, but this gave the Allies an opportunity to launch their own attack. Sudden Strike 4: Africa – Desert War is part of the Sudden Strike 4 series. It was released as a free update for all players that already own Sudden Strike 4: World at War (PS4 / Xbox One / PC). 's Latest Spectrum: First Light opens a new chapter for CBS Interactive. The eCommerce focused section of CBSi's website, Spectrum, recently relaunched from a clean slate. As of August 23, 2004, Spectrum is the primary means of purchasing new games, movies, music, movies, books, software and DVDs. It's also a place to find free games and other entertainment, read an opinion piece about videogames, as well as find the answers to common questions and share a little bit of everything else. We had a chance to talk to Eric Boxleitner, Vice President of Marketing at CBSi, about the latest additions to his eCommerce division and lessons learned during the transition. This enlightening chat took place before Spectrum's relaunch as well as after the site was completed, following the feedback we received about the end result. Bravo: Eric, tell us about the launch and what your goals were. Boxleitner: Spectrum's goal is to be the first stop online for entertainment-related stuff. Bravo: How did you plan on achieving this goal? Boxleitner: We wanted to reinvent Spectrum. Our target is to be an e-commerce site. The idea is to make the buying experience so easy and easy to use and to understand so consumers are able to get what they want. Bravo: Do you think the idea of telling people they can get free stuff online is new, or do you think other media companies have offered this type of service in the past? Boxleitner: No, it's just a different style of marketing. We wanted to give consumers a reason to come to the site. We believe consumers are looking for things that they have trouble finding locally. Bravo: At the time of the launch, there were a lot of sites that were already offering this type of service, why did you think creating this type of site would be so unique and stand out as a site you can't find in a mall or local store? Boxleitner: The World Wide Web is best known as a destination for information. Yet in the technology boom where PCs were being distributed, it was a content delivery network. Digital distribution is becoming the content delivery network. We often think about the Web as a self-congratulatory system of getting information. We now view the Web as an advertiser-supported network. Bravo
