The gene encoding alpha-enolase, ENOA, is often over-expressed in breast cancer and its over-expression is associated with aggressive breast cancer. Over-expression of alpha-enolase and beta-2-microglobulin in non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) cells is also a sign of malignant transformation, and is correlated with tumour stage and outcome. We performed an immunohistochemical study to investigate whether ENOA over-expression in NSCLC predicts for poor prognosis. We also investigated the association between the expression of alpha-enolase and clinical outcomes in NSCLC patients with chemotherapy. Expression of alpha-enolase in NSCLC tumour cells was analysed immunohistochemically in 123 patients with NSCLC who underwent lobectomy and/or systematic lymph node dissection. Expression of alpha-enolase in NSCLC tumour cells was associated with advanced stage and poor prognosis in patients with NSCLC. In multivariate analysis, alpha-enolase expression was the independent prognostic factor for overall survival in patients with advanced stage NSCLC. The Kaplan-Meier survival curves revealed that alpha-enolase was an independent prognostic factor in patients with advanced NSCLC and had a tendency to be associated with poor survival in patients with early-stage disease. Our results suggest that alpha-enolase expression is a useful prognostic marker in patients with advanced stage NSCLC. The present invention relates to security key fobs used to open vehicles, and particularly to preventing unauthorized keys from being used on a vehicle with the key fob. Vehicle security systems include vehicle anti-theft systems that prevent someone from taking a vehicle without a key or key fob. Many of the security systems use a remote control device that needs to be in a particular position to unlock the vehicle. This typically allows the remote control device to be tracked down if it is lost or stolen by a person searching for the remote control device. Suicide methods use of youth in the US, 1979-2006. To
