This invention relates to noise-cancelling headphones, and more particularly to such headphones which employ noise-cancelling microphones. The use of headphones in conjunction with a sound source is well-known, and is widely accepted. This is true both in an environment of a normal outdoor walk, where one simply wants to hear the natural sounds around and under the feet of the listener, and in environments of motor vehicles or sea travel, where isolation of the sounds in the head-cage is sought for purposes of safety. Various approaches have been taken in the art to use headphones to block out as much ambient noise as possible, or to block out the ambient noise so that the sound of a speaker or other source can be heard more clearly. One of the earliest such headphone devices is called noise-cancelling headphones. These have essentially two parts: a speaker which produces the desired sounds; and a microphone which picks up the sounds from the environment and sends them to a processor. The processor determines the difference between the desired sounds (produced by the speaker) and the ambient sounds (picked up by the microphone), and then sends this "cancelled" signal to the speaker to cancel out the ambient sounds. For example, if the speaker is used to produce sounds of a particular frequency, and the ambient sounds include sounds of that same frequency, then the sound-attenuating microphone picks up the ambient sounds and sends them to the processor, and the processor sends back to the speaker the processed sound of only the desired one. The processor can employ various methods to determine the difference between the desired and ambient sounds, and there are different types of processors available. For example, the processor can employ spectrum analysis, or even artificial neural networks. These are specialized systems designed to distinguish between desired and ambient sounds. The processor can be inserted into the speaker and/or can be provided as a separate chip. The desired sounds can also be generated by a microphone, and the process of the cancellation is reversed, where the ambient sounds are blocked by the speaker. The preferred means of attaching the components to the head-cage are fasteners such as elastic cords,
