The Apple TV is a television and Apple Pay is a solution to all of the weariness of having to both use a card and a phone. Q: Why is the '+' operator creating a new object in JavaScript? I know that in Java, the + operator creates a new object, and I was thinking about how to do something similar in JavaScript. I just came across this example using a + to check that a function is being called properly: function add1() { alert('1'); } function add2() { alert('2'); } add1(); alert(add2()); // alerts '2' add2(); // alerts '2' Why is it that, if I call add2() after add1(), it executes properly? It seems like the function being called is add1(), and that its result is passed to add2(). A: The + operator isn't creating a new object, it's converting a string to a number. Both add1 and add2 return 1. If you want to pass a function reference into a function call, you need to make an explicit call: add2(); // alerts '2' add1(); // Call add2 add2(); // alerts '2' Q: Does JDBC support multi-threaded 6d1f23a050
